CHARLES DIBDIN.

NO collection of English songs, worthy of the title, would be complete without a few examples of the genius of CHARLES DIBDIN. Many of his compositions have won their way into the hearts of the people, and may be fairly quoted as national. The particulars of his life have been frequently told, and it is therefore needless to recapitulate them here. It is sufficient to say that he was born in Southampton on March 15, 1745. He was the eighteenth child of his father. His elder brother Thomas, a sea captain, was the original "Poor Tom" of the "Sailor's Epitaph." Of the rest of the family little is known that is interesting. Young Charles Dibdin was a chorister in Winchester Cathedral, and studied music under Peter Fussell, the deputy of James Kent, organist of the Cathedral. Some of Kent's Anthems, with treble solo parts, were written for young Dibdin. By his own account he learnt little from either of these musicians, and owed all his musical knowledge to himself. The absence of scientific knowledge in the construction of melody is apparent to every musician who has studied Dibdin's Songs. His airs are very original, but the difficulty of harmonising them properly was never solved by the composer himself, for many of his own arrangements lack the continuity and polish which is found in the works of trained writers. It is chiefly for the wealth of poetic sentiment, which his songs contain, that they have fastened themselves upon the sympathies of the people. This quality made his sea-songs—though he was never a sailor himself—so great a power in maintaining the prestige of the English navy, and has invested his name with the nobility of gratitude as great and as honourable as a ducal patent. His life was a continuous struggle with straitened means. His genius was many-sided. He made so great a success as an actor in the part of Ralph in Bickerstaffe's "Maid of the Mill," that "Ralph" handkerchiefs were woven and sold in his honour. He invented the plan of giving monologue entertainments, and wrote a large number of pieces for these purposes. He was the author of over seventy operatic pieces, produced at various theatres between the years 1762 and 1811, and about thirty-five entertainments in which he was the sole performer. He wrote the words and composed the music for more than a thousand songs, besides supplying words for other composers. His ideas were new and fresh, and have formed a mine which has furnished material for much "original" work done by later authors. He died at Camden Town on July 25, 1814, and was buried in the graveyard in Pratt Street, where a monument, recently restored, covers his remains.

The particulars of his career have been told by himself in his "Professional Life," four vols., 1803; by George Hogarth in a Preface to a collection of the words of his many songs and a selection of his music, 1842; and more recently by the editor of the present work, in The Musical Times for 1886, and by his great-grandson, James C. Dibdin, in a series of articles in the Scottish Art Review.
